PHYSICALLY

Mokio has a strong physical base for his age, standing at 1.82m with a genuinely explosive profile. He carries good top speed, sharp agility and clean footwork, which lets him cover ground and change direction smoothly. He is still physically underdeveloped, however — most noticeably in his strength in duels, where added power will be needed to compete at a higher level.

IN POSSESSION

On the ball he is quick to decide and moves it efficiently. He is comfortable in short combinations, often playing one-touch to help maintain possession and keep the ball circulating, and clearly prefers progressing through passing rather than carrying. Under pressure his passing remains secure.

When he is asked to carry the ball, though, he becomes less reliable — the occasional loose touch and rushed decision creep in. Developing more consistent ball-carrying and line-breaking progression is the clearest next step in his attacking game.

OUT OF POSSESSION

Defensively, Mokio reads the game well but is not yet consistent, and this shows most clearly when he is asked to protect the #6 zone. He is generally reliable when tracking runs in behind and dealing with long balls, giving his back line a dependable screen against direct play.

In pressing situations he is aggressive but often over-eager. He tends to step out too early without adjusting his body shape or timing, which can leave him bypassed or lead to fouls in dangerous areas. Sharpening his pressing triggers and positional discipline will make his defensive output far more consistent.

SUMMARY

Overall, Mokio is a technically clean and intelligent young midfielder with strong physical foundations and clear long-term potential. He is not yet ready for a consistent starting role at a higher level, as he currently lacks the physical dominance, positional discipline and progressive impact required of a top-level defensive midfielder. The recommendation is to keep him under observation as a long-term developmental option and to reassess as his physical and tactical game matures.
