Physically

Olderheim is a lean winger with excellent acceleration, agility, and footwork, allowing him to change direction quickly and maintain close control at high speed. His top speed is good rather than elite. He lacks physical strength and can be pushed off the ball in duels, while his intensity and efficiency tend to drop in the final stages of matches.

Strengths

Olderheim is a creative winger whose biggest strengths are his dribbling, link-up play, and decision-making. He manipulates defenders with excellent timing, body feints, and quick changes of direction, making him highly effective in 1v1 situations. He scans frequently, plays with his head up, and consistently makes good decisions in possession, whether combining in tight spaces, creating chances, or delivering crosses with either foot. He is more of a creator than a goalscorer and shows intelligent pressing through good positioning and timing.

Weaknesses

His main weaknesses are his physical profile and limited runs in behind. He lacks strength in physical duels and can struggle against stronger defenders. Defensively, he contributes mainly through positioning rather than physical actions, and his influence can decrease late in matches as his physical output drops. His long-term ceiling will depend on how much he can improve physically over the next few years.

Follow-up Recommendation

I initially wanted to recommend signing him immediately, but after considering his recent long-term injury, I would suggest monitoring him for the next 6–12 months until he returns and reaches full fitness. His profile is almost ideal for what Djurgården are looking for, and he has significant resale potential. Although his current market value of around €3 million would represent a record-level investment for the club, it could be justified given his potential to generate a much higher future transfer fee.
